Worldly living

Heather's love for experiencing the world began as a child when she moved with her mother from her birthright Scotland to Northern England. After completing her formal education, Heather launched a successful career in finance with Bank of America's International Division. Based out of London, Heather's opportunities to visit, work and live in countries throughout Europe, the Middle East and North Africa were like a "dream come true," as she always longed to travel extensively.

Heather attributes her desire and drive to succeed to her mother, a woman from whom she inherited a quick wit, sense of humor and the strength to adapt to any situation – especially when it came to creating a home, no matter where she lived.

Family moves

Soon after meeting her American husband, Heather retired from her career to start a family. But, the moves continued since her husband's position with Bank of America required several international relocations.

Of the several relocations Heather made, the move from the Cayman Islands to Northern California required a great deal of organization, patience and, of course, her mother's sense of humor.

While her husband spent long hours settling into his new job, Heather multi-tasked as a mother, wife and relocation director in the search of their new home. She accomplished this all while giving herself a cram course in learning about the new community in which she was about to live and raise her family.

Through her personal experiences, she was inspired to author a relocation guide to help others who were moving to the Sonoma, California area, classically entitled "Nobody's Mother Lives Here." The book features the names and contact information of reputable goods and services providers, as well as a humorous introduction to the people of the area. The book became so popular that Fortune 500 companies like Hewlett Packard purchased the guide as a gift to their relocating employees.
